Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from My Journal in Foreign Lands The first day at sea! who can describe the novelty of the situation or picture the shifting scenes of the highly colored panorama! all within bustling and busy; all without unchangeable and tireless. Our steward says the sea is so smooth that he scarcely knows the ship is moving. But far otherwise does it seem to me. We started out on one of the most glorious mornings I have ever known; the sun shining in its strength, the ocean a sapphire sea covered with a thousand snowy crests, laughing and leaping with delight. Now up, now down, our good ship rearfe and plunges, a splendid witness to the skill of man and the overruling Hand of God. We have one hundred and eighty-four saloon passengers, and with the sailors, waiters, officers, c, I judge we do not carry more than two hundred and fifty souls. We have spent the entire day on deck and taken a good deal of exercise, so that by this time(9 p.m.) everyone is pretty well played out, and all seem to be lounging around in durance vile, as the evening hours wear away. April 26th. At the end of the second day at sea I reach the conclusion that only the courageous and energetic should attempt a seavoyage; nor can I conceive how one in search only of pleasure can support this life of enforced inactivity and searching introspection. Again we wend our way to the saloon to chronicle the days doings. This long narrow hall, which serves as dining-room, parlor, music and sitting-room is very bright and attractive; the four long tables running the...
