Excerpt: . two he wrote before he went to Italy after their parting; but his letters to his friends are filled with that anguish and longing of the heart that tears him whenever he thinks of her. I can bear to die; I cannot bear to leave her, he cries. The very thing I want to live for will be a great occasion of my death. I wish for death every day and night to deliver me from these pains, and then I wish death away, for death would destroy these pains, which are better than nothing. Again, -Oh that I could be buried near where she lives! I am afraid to write to her, to receive a letter from her; to see her handwriting would break my heart. Even to hear of her, to see her name written, would be more than I can bear. Where can I look for consolation or ease? If I had any chance of recovery, this passion would kill me. Not very long after these words were written, the tortured, restless heart was still, and in a few months the daisies, whose tender roots he had felt piercing his grave before he lay asleep there, were covering him over with their quietness and peace. Keats to Fanny Brawne. Newport, 10th July, 1819. My Sweet Girl, --Your letter gave me more delight than anything in the world but yourself could do; indeed, I am almost astonished that any absent one...
